'The Level of Foolishness Here is Unprecedented': Researchers Pitch 'One-and-Done' COVID-Flu Vaccine for Babies

Researchers at the University of California, Riverside, proposed a new RNA-based vaccine they said could provide durable protection for infants against COVID-19 and flu with just one dose. Experts warn the untested technology could lead to breakthrough infections, higher mortality rates and potential brain toxicity in babies.

Researchers are pitching a new vaccine that, according to Forbes, could give infants long-lasting protection from COVID-19 and flu with a single "one-and-done" shot — perhaps even leading to a "universal vaccine."

The research article, published on April 17 in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences (PNAS) by scientists at the University of California, Riverside (UCR), described how a single dose of a vaccine using "small interfering RNA" (siRNA) molecules demonstrated a "rapid and long-lasting protective immunity" against a lethal virus challenge in immune-deficient mice.

The researchers proposed that an siRNA-based flu vaccine could protect infants without relying on maternal antibodies, according to a UCR press release.

They are considering a nasal spray delivery method instead of the typical intramuscular shot, as "respiratory infections move through the nose, so a spray might be an easier delivery system."

Experts who spoke with The Defender raised concerns about the lack of human trials and the novel technology's safety and long-term effects on vulnerable populations.

"The level of foolishness here is unprecedented," said Brian Hooker, Ph.D., chief scientific officer at Children's Health Defense. "The immune systems of infants simply cannot tolerate this type of infective agent," he said. "It will lead to breakthrough infections and higher levels of mortality."

What is siRNA?

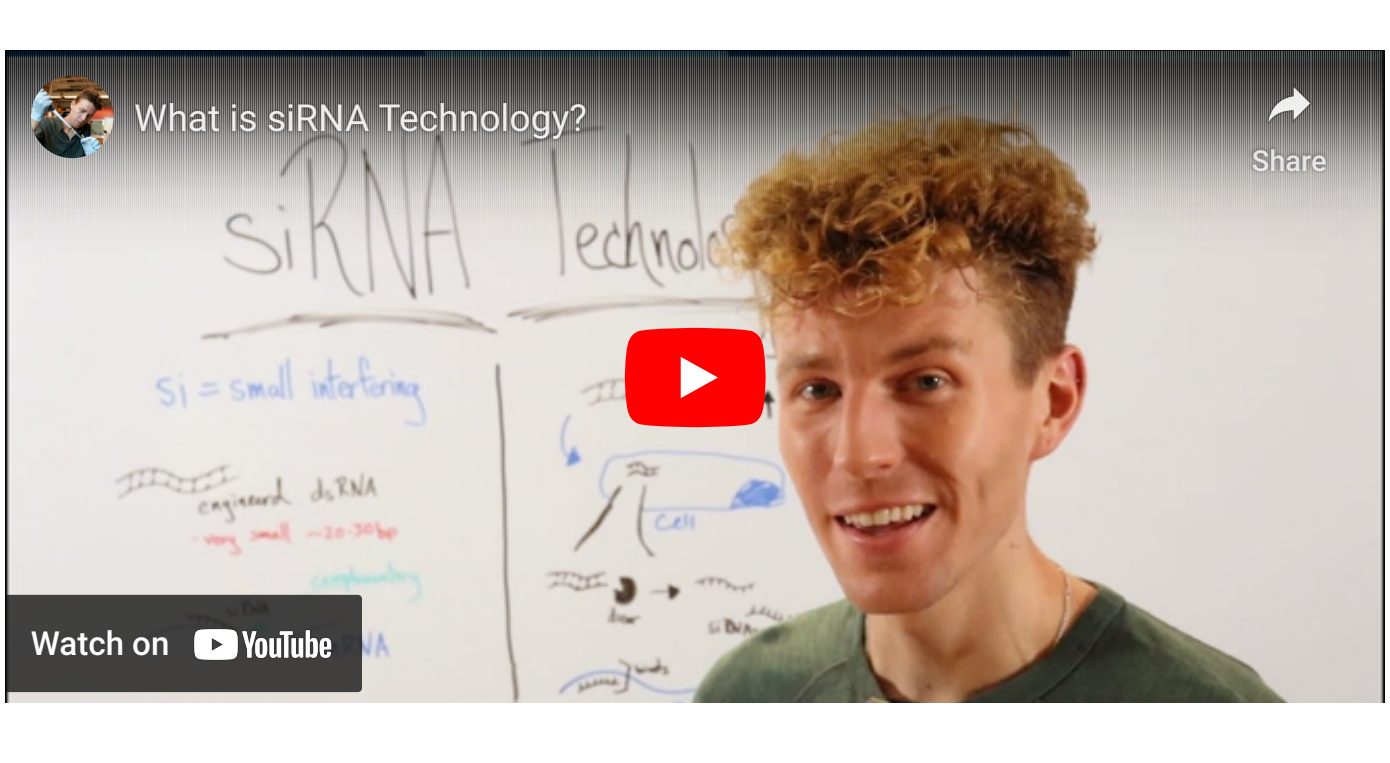
The science of siRNA, which has been in development since the late 1990s, differs significantly from traditional vaccine methods, which typically use inactivated bits of viruses to stimulate the immune system and confer immunity.

It also differs from modified-RNA or mRNA vaccine technology used in the Pfizer and Moderna vaccines, which hijack the body's cellular machinery and cause it to create the spike protein, purportedly to induce an immune response. Instead, siRNA works by interfering with the natural messenger RNA of replicating viruses, effectively disabling them.

Small interfering RNA or siRNA is a type of RNA molecule that plays a key role in a cellular process called RNA interference (RNAi).

RNAi is a natural mechanism used by cells to regulate gene expression and defend against viral infections. The short, double-stranded siRNA molecules can bind to complementary sequences on messenger RNA (mRNA) and target them for degradation.

By selectively destroying specific natural messenger RNA (mRNA), siRNA can effectively "silence" the expression of corresponding genes. This ability to knock down disease-causing genes makes siRNA a promising tool for developing targeted therapies for conditions such as cancer, viral infections and genetic disorders.



"The siRNA molecules, carried and delivered by nanocarriers, have been explored in the treatments of cancer," explained Dr. Michelle Perro, an integrative medicine pediatrician and author of "What's Making Our Children Sick?" "Even in the cancer arena, there are still many hurdles in their employment," she said.

The siRNA drug patisiran, a treatment for polyneuropathy, uses lipid nanoparticles (LNPs) as the nanocarrier. LNPs have already proven toxic in COVID-19 mRNA vaccines, accumulating in the ovaries, liver, spleen, adrenal glands, bone marrow and other organs.

However, the authors of the PNAS article did not indicate whether their research vaccine contained LNPs. The Defender did not receive a response to our requests for more information by the time this article was published.

Dr. Michael Palmer, a member of Doctors for COVID Ethics, said he was intrigued at the protective effect of siRNA on experimental animals lacking a proper immune system. However, he noted that in immunologically competent animals, "The adaptive immune response snuffs out their crippled vaccine virus before it can generate a proper siRNA response."

Palmer pointed out that siRNA vaccines might omit the adjuvants commonly used in vaccines, which are responsible for "some of the worst vaccine side effects."

He said that because the primary goal of siRNA does not include triggering an immune response, "maybe this technology could indeed lead to safer vaccines in the future, at least against some viruses."

'The universal vaccine that we have been looking for'

The UCR researchers used a mouse virus transmitted by mosquitoes called Nodamura as a model to test the vaccine on mutant mice lacking T and B lymphocyte immune cells. These immune cells play a crucial role in the body's adaptive immune response, which is responsible for creating specific antibodies against invading pathogens.

By using mice without these cells, the researchers aimed to demonstrate the effectiveness of the siRNA vaccine against a virus in the absence of traditional adaptive immune responses — responses that are not yet developed in human infants.

"The reason viruses successfully cause disease is because they produce proteins that block a host's RNAi response," explained lead author Shou-Wei Ding, Ph.D., distinguished professor of microbiology at UCR. By creating a mutant virus that cannot produce this protein, the researchers were able to weaken the virus and use it as a vaccine to boost the RNAi immune system.

One potential benefit of this approach is that it could eliminate the need for strain-specific vaccines, the researchers said.

"What I want to emphasize about this vaccine strategy is that it is broad," said UCR virologist and study co-author Rong Hai, Ph.D. "It is broadly applicable to any number of viruses, broadly effective against any variant of a virus, and safe for a broad spectrum of people."

"This could be the universal vaccine that we have been looking for," Hai added.

This technology would be effective regardless of viral mutations, according to Hai. "Viruses may mutate in regions not targeted by traditional vaccines," he said. "However, we are targeting their whole genome with thousands of small RNAs. They cannot escape this."

The researchers propose the siRNA technology could in the future be applied to other diseases.

"There are several well-known human pathogens; dengue, SARS, COVID. They all have similar viral functions," said Ding. "This should be applicable to these viruses in an easy transfer of knowledge."

'Influenza simply isn't a baby killer'

Some experts raised concerns about the safety and long-term implications of the siRNA vaccine technology, particularly for infants and immunocompromised individuals.

"There is a reason why vaccine safety trials take decades to release: so that adverse effects/outcomes can be monitored and assessed," said Perro. "This proposition is not only rushed but not trialed in humans."

Perro cited the need for a "gold standard double-blinded placebo-controlled study" to guarantee the safety of experimental therapies for vulnerable babies.

Perro raised concerns about the drug's potential toxicity, particularly when delivered via nasal spray. "The cribriform plate separates the nasal fossa from the cranium and is spongy in nature," she said. Theoretically, nanoparticles would have direct access to the brain."

Perro also pointed out that the researchers' belief that the technology is suitable for babies because their immune systems are still developing is "exactly the same argument that should be presented as to why they should not be allowed into our babies: because their immune systems are still developing and adverse reactions may be fatal."

Palmer agreed, calling the researchers' claims that babies will "no longer have to depend on their mothers' antibodies" a "red light."

"That's just the usual warped worldview — that we shouldn't rely on our inborn and natural ability to defend against disease, but embrace technology instead," Palmer said. "Influenza simply isn't a baby killer, so they are proposing an answer to a question that nobody asked."

Known problems of siRNA technology

The long-term effects of siRNA-based vaccines on the developing immune systems of infants and immunocompromised individuals remain unknown. However, research on siRNA technology has already revealed negative side effects.

One issue is the activation of the innate immune system, which can lead to the production of inflammatory cytokines and the activation of immune cells. This activation can result in inflammation and immune responses against the synthetic RNA molecules.

In severe cases, this immune overreaction, known as a cytokine storm, can be life-threatening.

Another possible concern with siRNA technology is the risk of off-target effects, where the siRNA binds to and degrades unintended mRNAs with similar sequences, leading to unwanted side effects.

These may include dysregulation of gene expression, alterations in cellular processes and potential toxicity.

Commenting on off-target effects, Hooker said siRNAs "by definition are 'small' and could have sufficient homology to disrupt the function of genes in the human genome."

He expressed concern that the new medical paradigm initiated by the "Operation Warp Speed" mentality could "rush this type of technological nightmare to the market and sacrifice many babies."

Rushing COVID-19 mRNA vaccines to market didn't go well, according to Perro. "It has now been revealed that the design of the mRNA vaccines via a pseudouridine addition is a carcinogen," noted Perro, who said scientists have known about its toxicity for decades.

"So we have already unleashed oncogenic [cancer-causing] experimental therapies into our children via the mRNA vaccine and they want to take this further?" she asked.

Perro said Big Pharma has been trying to move away from standard vaccine production due to manufacturing costs.

"By engineering and manipulating RNA and DNA through genetic manipulation using microbes, the process is accelerated," she said. "They got their foot in the door with the EUA [emergency use authorization] for the COVID mRNA vaccines."

The regulatory landscape for siRNA therapeutics is still evolving. The U.S. Food and Drug Administration approved patisiran, the first siRNA-based therapeutic, in 2018.

Babies and children should be allowed, where possible, to develop their immune system naturally. When I grew up it was normal and acceptable for toddlers and infants to sometimes have a snotty nose. Generally, they were fine. Researchers seem to be developing high tech vaccinations for a problem that, in reality, doesn't exist. How many more vaccinations are babies going to be subjected to?

No new-born infant should be given a vaccine of any type! The immune system takes time to develop. When my children were born (1966, '71' '74' 77), I was advised by the doctor to wait until they were 2 years old before getting their vaccines, which I did. Those were the only vaccines my kids had -- EVER! Today's vaccine schedule sounds like a recipe for the destruction of the immune system of every child born! Many young moms are now saying "NO" to vaccines at birth for their children. People are catching on!

Only thing that is good about these sorts of shots is that they tell you which doctors are not worthy of our trust. Let's just hope the mothers have woken up and know to say no because there is absolutely no good reason beyond profit to be giving any child under 2 a vaccine.

Why anyone would ever give this to their baby is beyond me!! It's great if it does away with adjuvants, but there no need to give a baby a shot for either the flu OR Covid; they're not at risk! They're better off getting it, then making immunity to it in the future!

> True. I am 75 now. When a child in the 1950's the only vaccine I got was 2 polio shots. I missed the third one. I also missed the smallpox shot cuz I was SO scared of needles that I vomited and they skipped me cuz they thought I was sick and in those days they didn't vax if a child was sick. I got my first lipoma lump on my thigh when I was 18. Now I have a lot more. On my inner wrist, arms, thighs, calves, and on my hip. Maybe 20 in all. I believe the lipomas are from the 2 polio vaccines I got.

Infants have the most resilient immune systems. They should develop their immunities naturally with their own bodies producing their own defenses to viruses they encounter. Another rush to market with a new vaccine that's only been tested on mutated mice is inviting more infant mortality. Yes, deaths. Safe and effective, right? Don't believe it for a second, parents. Your most important duty is to protect your child from harm. SAY NO!

So the culling of the human race now continues, led by the failed safety of the Vax. Those people who are so swayed to the side that our now government only has our best interests at heart are following the Pied Piper down the path of least resistance to their demise. Science is not the end all to end all if you have those who lead in this experiment of reducing the population to have more power over fewer people. The powerful and monied want only one thing, more of each. They are without morals and godless, in other words, robots. There's a reason the world in now in endless wars. You have to ask yourself why. If you're honest, there is no answer because it doesn't make sense, unless it is to continue to eradicate all that is human in us. Bring on the robots, and yes they are.

“They got their foot in the door with the EUA [emergency use authorization] for the COVID mRNA vaccines.”

And they barged right on through, with the FDA approving Comirnaty only about 8 months after EUA public release, in order to justify federal mandates to take the shot. With their body well through the door now, they want to RNA all vaccines. There won't be a 10 year waiting period for them either. Rubber stamp approval, just as there was to add the Covid shot to the children's vaccine schedule.

I watched the embedded video with Dr. Casey Means (it was fascinating). Then I found another video featuring Dr. Means in which she discusses the relationship of high blood sugar to COVID outcomes (everything she said made sense).

But then, in her next breath, she made the remark that "masks, social distancing and hand sanitizer" are also effective tools against COVID.

I believe she's an incredibly smart physician, but PUHLEEZE!!! She lost a little of her credibilty with me with that remark!

It's hard to take someone seriously when they parrot things like masks (which obviously do not work - there area a multitude of studies on this) and "social distancing" (which was admittedly pulled out of their rear ends). How about looking at the ingredients of the things you put into and on your body, whether that be food or drugs or makeup or deodorant, etc.?

As was mentioned during Covid RNA injectable warp speed process - "Future framework." Just plug in RNA sequence and play. No testing necessary because that was done in the original Covid human trial. The last updated mRNA Covid shot was tested only on 8 mice. Nothing to see here, move along, take your updated shot.

After the corruption in the testing, manufacture and promotion of the Covid shots, i have zero interest in any RNA vaccine.
